

I'm not robot

I am not robot!

To this end, there is a need to design a strategic plan that is both achievable and realistic. The following part explores the role of the media as a mechanism to protect human rights. In Ethiopia, there have been dramatic improvements in the historical development of the media in three consecutive governments of Ethiopia to evaluate the political discourses related to the activities of the media in Ethiopia, and to identify the challenges and prospects of the media development in Ethiopia. By examining the relationship between political power and the media in Ethiopia over the past twenty years, and focusing on how a strategy for new media progressively developed, this article aims to initiate a new debate regarding how Ethiopia's media system can best be understood from Media Reform amid Political Upheaval: Media Reform during Ethiopia's Political Transition. Ethiopia became one of the leading jailers of journalists as the government used defamation and anti-terrorism laws to stifle opposition and free speech. Louis () states that a regulatory body is an institutional contribution of Media for Policy Making Process in Ethiopia, particularly EBC. A qualitative research This review highlights the current state of the media landscape, media practitioners as well as media-related proclamations and practices in Ethiopia. It unpacks how media regulations, associations, Ethiopia needs a strong media that can function as a fourth Estate. Citations (15) References (57) Figures (1) Abstract and Figures. Because the country is in the midst of political transitions, the role of media becomes even more important. The media industry in Ethiopia faces a system of stringent laws and regulations from regulatory bodies. Ethiopia is one of the very few African countries where the local language press is in Together with two Ethiopian experts Mekuria Mekasha and Theodros Woudneh an Assessment of Ethiopian Media Landscape with recommendations for future media reforms as well as a draft National Media Policy were produced for the Ethiopian government. The assessment recognizes that the newly introduced Ethiopian media law and media policy could play a pivotal role in promoting liberal and professional media in the country. The council envisages a free, independent, and thriving media operating to the highest professional and ethical standard to safeguard and promote professional and ethical standards within the Ethiopian mass media. The review, therefore, aimed Addis Ababa University.