Although the folklore surrounding La Llorona typically claims she drowned her own children, she tells Odilia this is not true The summer one year after Odilia 's father leaves her, her Mamá, and her sisters behind, American Snout butterflies swarm her hometown of Eagle Pass, Texas. Juanita calls after her, insisting they outvote her four to one, but Odilia tries to move things along at the gas station, worried about attracting attention. The couple running the convenience store seem suspicious of Odilia and Juanita after they argue about the number of sodas they need. Since Papá is no longer sending money, Mamá has gotten a job, leaving the girls unsupervised. She appears to Odilia near the riverbank and acts as the sisters' guide throughout their journey through Mexico. About the Book. When they return to the car, Velia has Pita in a headlock, claiming that she was trying to call Mamá from a payphone. As the sun rises, a woman (Ixtali) paddles up to them and says the Great Mother (Tonantzin) sent her to take them across the water to their own board the canoe and sail away.
