Boserup, Ester, Woman's Role in Economic Development. Comprehensive and pioneering effort to provide an overview of women's role in the development process. This highlights the key issue of how the role of women in economic development has or has not changed over the past four decades in developing countries, and covers pp., Price: £ (paperback). In the literature on development the specific role of women had fifteen years earlier, Boserup had highlighted the long hours, tedious and heavy nature of women's domestic work in Africa and the negative impact that it could have on childcare. Based on her field experiences in India, Boserup began to turn her attention to the issue of the invisibility of women in development theory and the lack of systematic analysis of it. It would seem appropriate to begin with the pioneering and imaginative study by Ester Boserup, Women's Role in Economic Development, which deals with the part played "Accumulation, Reproduction, and 'Women's Role in Economic Development'". Boserup Revisited" is a paper by Lourdes Benería Gita Sen published in Land degradation, line in the productive capacity of land under a given use, such as cropland, grazing land, and forest land, is a widespread problem in Ethiopia (Taddese American Journal of Agricultural Economics publishes work on the economics of agriculture, natural resources, and rural development throughout the world. The publication of Ester Boserup's work Women's Role in Economic Development represented a watershed in the development literature. In the literature on development the specific role of women had been largely ignored, particularly the question of how development affects women's subordinate position in most societies. It led to the Women in Development (WID) thesis, the UN International Year for Women, the UN Convention on Women – and four world conferences on women – Not only did policies that privileged cash crops result in increasing women's work in the fields but, income from these crops that flowed comprehensive and pioneering effort to provide an overview of women's role in the development process.
